Excerpt: . . . that the question should be studied in each country as it had been in France. At the same time, the term for working the invention might be extended to three years from the grant of the patent, as in some countries, such as Germany, the patent is only granted a considerable time after the application. He thought they might pass the following resolution: --The Milan Congress, while upholding the resolution passed at Berlin, according to which under the new text of the Convention omission to work an invention shall in any case only entail the grant of a compulsory licence as provided by the law of each State, adds that the term for working the invention should be extended to at least three years from the date of the grant of the patent, and recommends that in each country the members of the Executive Committee of the Association should draw up under the direction of a secretary appointed by the Executive Committee, a draft law, as the French Association has done, for the application of a system of compulsory licences as an alternative where the patentee has omitted to work his invention, and for the exchange of licences between the inventor and a third party who takes out a patent for an improvement on the invention. Mr. Bede went over the points mentioned in his written report, and strongly opposed a system which would allow a patentee to go on manufacturing abroad until forced...
