Excerpt from An Address Delivered at the Commencement of the Lectures in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in the City of New-York The great advantages arising to {b ciety, from well regulated public femi naries of learning, have always been apparent to the venerable fages and il lustrious legi?ators of ancient and mo dern times. Schools for education are nearly coeval with the dawns of fci ence. Our European ancef tors, fome time after the firfl: emigrations to this American continent, founded literary infiitutions. Their defcendants, with laudable zeal, have continued to promote them in proportion to the aggrandizement and population of the Country; but the efiablilhment Of a college in the new world, for the fole pur pofe of promoting medical education, was firfi directed by a law of this Rate, upon an application of the Regents of the Unix verfity to the legi?ature, for that pnrpofe.
