I have wished for a universal language in such times. And then to notice the eye kindle and the interest return, as some subject they could comprehend was touched, led me to conclude I was upon the wrong road when following the tracks of an author.while teaching a class of children. I think it to be our duty to study this subject well, and not allow the child to--shall I say?---waste hours, days, and perhaps years, poring over something which/in all probability, will never benefit him to any very great extent. Life is too short. The time in which we learn most easily flits past too rapidly to allow of its being uselessly employed. I would have him learn Geography, and thoroughly too, but not burden the memory with useless facts. The foregoing remarks do not apply with as much...
