Excerpt from book: SECT. II. REGINALD had fought his brother, and recounted all his interview with him. Greyfill accused him of violence and turbulence, and urged the necessity of well-timed diffimulation, of art, caution, and smooth addresses. The Monk was provoked at this assertion of superior wisdom, and, instead of retorting his reproof, displayed the stolen jewel, in silent and contemptuous triumph. Grey was too well versed in the arts of fraud and mischief, not to conceive at once, that this ring was to be used for deceiving the brethren of the monastery, or abusing Oswald, as occasions might require, by pretended orders and directions from the Countess. He viewed it eagerly, and regarded it, (not without reason) as an invaluable instrument of his purposes, too important to be entrusted wholly to the violent hands of Reginald. He commended his zeal and addresses, which, he confidently promised, should, in due time, meet their full reward: he invited him to refreshment; reminded him of his fatigue, and that the hour of rest approached: he promised that, by the dawn of morning, he himself would be ready to accompany him to the monastery, where he made no doubt of happily accomplishing their purposes, and laying a firm foundation of their future fortunes. Reginald yielded to his instances, and retired. Grey repaired without delay to the apartment of Lord Raymond, and appeared before him with a face of joy and satisfaction. He congratulated him upon the prospect of...
