Excerpt from Annals of Wyoming, Vol. 3: July, 1925 One day we came in sight of Elk Mountain, which, at that time had considerable snow showing up on the side facing us. Mr. Seabold was so disgusted with the sight of snow in the summer time, that he got his wife to drive the team, and he crawled back in the wagon, and went to sleep. After a few hours he woke up, and lifting the wagon sheet, at the side, looked out. Well, said he, I m glad we got by that d d snow bank. No, said Mrs. Seabold, you may as well go back to sleep for that d d snowbank, is right there ahead of us where it s been all day. We were traveling on the Bitter Creek trail; but left the wagon train at Pinegrove, and crossed over to Rawlins, and from there through Whisky Gap, and struck the old Mormon trail below Three Crossings, on the Sweetwater river. There was no direct road from Rawlins to Lan der, at that time, and it was a very...
