A SUMMARY For the customs and regulations that prevailed in East-Kent, we refer the reader to our future general recapitulation, where we (hall comprehensively review both divisions of the county, with their tenants in capite, knights, and military retainers; their laws, fines, for violation of the peace, infringement on the royal roads, or rivers, burglary, and other particular circumstances. We now proceed with our survey of West-Kent, according to the principles adopted, and having previously described the state of the city of Rochester, shall pursue our former plan, beginning with Greenwich hundred, in the lath of Sutton, and the north-westernly district; and continue our route in a south-easternly direction. Rochester. The city of Rochester, like Canterbury, and the boroughs of this county, contained a number of inhabitants, honoured with the title of burgesses, that had emigrated from the manours of their feudal lords, and continued under their power and patronage. This city was so inconsiderable, of itself, in the days of the Confessour, that it was only estimated at the small sum of five pounds. It was principally occupied by eighty dependants of the bishop, from the manour of Frindfbury, whose...
