Excerpt from The True Aims of American Ambition: An Address Delivered Before the Literary Societies of Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, September 15, 1852 What a contrast is presented to this arrogant adventure of wrong and rapine, by the departure and return of that high and holy enterprise which, many ages after, and when Athens and Syracuse were remembered dreams, left the port of Palos to dare an unknown ocean and an unknown fate! Their feeble vessels glittered with no pomp and blazed with no anticipated triumph; and though friends were there, pale and anxious, to bid a faltering God Speed to the majestic Columbus and his hardy followers, no shout broke the Silence; and their adieus were uttered amid tears, and prayers, and hopes that trembled like terrors. the sea, whose untracked waste they entered upon, stretched before them - as the expanse of time, my young friends, stretches before you - chartless and limitless; and they sought, as you seek, a world - the Atlantis of Plato, the vision of the poet and philosopher for ages. Launched upon that sea, their aim the loftiest that ever lifted human ambition, how did they return? A continent leaned forward to receive them. Princes and monarchs hastened to give them welcome. They had sought a world and won it; and, amid prayers and rejoicings, the ringing of bells and the firing of cannon, Columbus displayed the evidences and trophies of that achievement which made him immortal, and changed the aspect and destinies of the world.
