It will be a fine opportunity for Edna, said Mrs. Conway. Edna did not like that word opportunity; it always seemed to her that it meant something unpleasant. She had noticed that when pleasant things came along they were rarely spoken of as opportunities, but were just happenings. So she sat with her little sturdy legs dangling down from the sofa, and a very sober look upon her round face, while her busy, dimpled hands were folded quietly. Her mother leaned over, and took the plump little fingers in hers, giving them a squeeze. It will be an opportunity, she repeated, as her eyes rested fondly on the child by her side; but she is only eight, and it seems like pushing her out of the nest before her wings are ready, poor birdie! O, no it doesn't, replied Mr. Conway. It will only be changing nests. Aunt Elizabeth will be just like a mother to her; it is not like a boarding-school, my dear. I know, replied Mrs. Conway, resting her cheek against Edna's little dark head. Should you...
