CHAPTER VIII FROM BOSCASTLE TO MILFORD I Left Boscastle on the 1st of July, at 5. 30 A. m. , bound for Lundy Island. The breeze was very fresh off the land, and came down in sharp squalls; the pilots advised me to keep quite close along the land, so as to cheat the tide. They were going to examine their fishing nets and lines just off the Beeny Sisters, consequently we sailed together that distance, and I kept close in-shore; but afterwards I steered out, in spite of the tide, for I found the winds eddy in the most perplexing manner, being at one moment south-east, and the next deflected by Sharpnose Head and the line of cliff to about north-east, which was, of course, slap in my teeth. I lost at least two hours of a fine breeze by hugging the shore, but I learnt my little lesson, and have most carefully avoided the close neighbourhood of elevated lands ever since. I did not hold the true wind until I had gained an offing of at least 1 miles, shortly after which time the land breeze died away and a head-wind met me from the north. The tide had turned in my favour, on which I stood well out to sea, being some six or eight miles out, so as to catch the full tidal swing, and so as to be to windward of my course for Lundy Island: which was the...
