Not illustrated. 1884 Excerpt: .the settlement of the native tribes, which are still nomadic, and the introduction of a European element, which of itself is capable of giving to pastoral industry all the development which it can take in Algeria. He goes on to say-- The influence on the Tell of this region so restored will be beyond all question considerable, rendering the climate more temperate, the rains more frequent and more regular; making. possible to the Algeriue colonists the rearing of cattle on an extensive scale; presenting to the Arab proprietors, who are forced to yield their lands to European industry as the only means of drawing from it great profit, a new field of activity better proportioned to their means of action; giving to commerce and industry new products; and, in fine, ensuring political security by peopling the frontiers of the Sahara. 1 And in a general point of view this restoration will be a commencement of taking possession of that Central Africa, towards which almost all modern nations to-day direct their desires and ambitions. At a conference held in Algiers on the 11th November 1881, M. Reynard, in the course of an address delivered by him, said: -- This work of the reboisement of five millions of hectares is a kind of speculation which only the State could undertake. The revenue, the interest of the half milliard thus invested, will be reimbursed to it by the increase of the public wealth, by the extension of its governmental...
