Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Bulletin of the Brooklyn Entomological Society, Vol. 1 Animals of all orders are raised now a days in captivity, from the most minute to the largest, even of those classes that require a large space for breeding, such as lions and elephants. In the field of Entomology the lepidopterist knows the greater part of the larva of his pets, while the coleopterist is acquainted with but very few. Why is this so? Is it because it is so very difficult to rear them or is it because there have been so few workers in this department of Natural History. Such thoughts agitated my mind two years ago, and I collected a number of our common Cicindelas viz. vulgaris, repanda, 12 guttata and hirticollis. I made for them a box (2 x 11/2 x 1 foot) of wood, glass and woven wire such as used for wire screens, and filled it 1/2 foot deep with sand making here and there a few miniature hills and in the middle of the box a valley, in which I placed a flat tin pan filled with water. At the two sides I placed pieces of green turf to represent a meadow. I fed the Cicindelas with different soft larva, small Chrysomelidae (Crocerus asparagi Diabrotica) etc. and kept them alive over two months. They copulated, dug holes in the sand, were running around during sunshine very lively till July 1., when I left for the country. After setting free the captive cicindelas, I could not detect any live thing in the box, but I did not consider my experiment a failure. During the last winter, I as well as several other members of our Society made preparations...
