Straightway they chose new associates, and bought new books, and sought for new pictures, having already found new meaning in the old ones. New visions met them on the sea, and in the sky, and around them on the earth. That which had been their throne became their footstool. That which they had hitherto regarded as a realm of visions and illusions became their home. I have seen a man, thoroughly absorbed in business, introduced to life by being compelled for a single winter to care for a few pots of flowers. The flowers became to him teachers, preachers, inspirers. They converted him--transformed him. Now, whenever he can steal away from his business, he is in his garden, where everything he touches thrives. You will see his name in all the horticultural reports of the section in which he lives, and if you enter his dwelling, you will find everything brought into harmony with his newlyborn taste; and you will find him living and enjoying life, and preparing to enjoy still more the wealth which his busy hands and tireless enterprise are acquiring. Mr. Wemmick, in Great Expectations, understood this matter very well. The office of Mr. Jaggers was by no means the place where he lived, or found the rewards of his life. I think that little castle of his at Walworth one of the most delightful and suggestive of all Dickens s creations. The real flag-staff, the draw-bridge...
