Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: .in the course of the recovery of an animal from an experimental lesion of any portion of the nervous system; there is first the acute state, during which the effects of the lesion are most severe or most noticeable. Following this, there is a period in which the effects grow generally less severe or less noticeable until a state is reached at which no further change occurs. The effects observed in the first state, but which disappear in the course of the second or recovery period, are commonly attributed to shock. The progress during the second period is often attributed to the general failure of the shock effect. The ultimate state of recovery, in which there is the deficiency of function, is taken as the truest index of the function of the injured portion of the nervous system. But there is no general agreement even here, for some insist that if shock could be completely eliminated, the recovery would be still more complete, while others feel inclined to set a limit to the effects of shock, and consider that the minimal deficiencies of function indicate the complete subsi 1 The author gratefully acknowledges her indebtedness to Prof. W. T. Porter for the generous hospitality of his laboratory in which these experiments were done, and to Prof. F. H. Pike for his guidance and help throughout the work. The paper was submitted as a thesis for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the Faculty of Pure...
