Excerpt from The American Book of Beauty, or Token of Friendship, for 1847 Upon the restoration of legitimate government in Hanover, civil and criminal jurisprudence resumed its former course. The old Roman and Caroline codes, which had been abrogated during the French occupation of Westphalia, at least as regards their application in some points, were revived. Among these the necessity of confession to enable summary punishment to be inflicted upon criminals, where direct testimony was wanting to establish guilt. It is necessary to mention this to account for what follows. Being seated one day at table near a councillor of the Supreme Court, our conversation chanced to fall upon music, and thence led to the malefactor, whose musical talents I criticised with some warmth. After moralizing upon the contrasts that oftentimes occur between the bounteous gifts of nature to man, and the devilish purposes to which he converts them, my learned neighbor continued It will be my painful duty this night to put that man's daring courage to the test. If he succumbs, death will be his doom; if he...
