Excerpt: . . . most countries the right to unite and the right to strike. In some countries the right of peaceful picketing is now guaranteed to the workers. Usually this is a result of an administrative measure, but the English parliament, during its last session, specifically granted the right in the Trades Disputes Bill. Injunctions are rarely used in Europe against labor organizations; but in case any court should be unwise enough to grant one, it would seldom be sustained. In some countries the use of the army and police against strikers is still common, and of course in all demonstrable instances of violence the intervention of the authorities is certain. Nothing, however, in Europe compares with the use commonly made of the army in America, and it is doubtful if anywhere else employers would be permitted to hire Pinkertons to shoot down or to intimidate starving workmen. As a matter of fact, things have changed greatly in most European countries during recent years. The socialist municipalities of Italy and France sometimes supply strikers with food and shelter, and in all cases they see that the children are cared for. In these instances the old order is completely reversed, and instead of the employer being given governmental aid to break strikes and to crush the workmen, the men are rendered assistance to the extent sometimes of direct contributions to their funds. The French chamber itself has many times, after the conclusion of a strike, voted financial aid...
