He would be apt to live much more in the world of romance than m that of reality, and with respect to the other sex, he would be inclined to cherish fanciful notions of their dispositions and characters. He has a bright imagination and ossesses the spirit of poetry in a very high degree, but e would be eu ject to great alternation of feeling. And would be susceptible of great extremes, both of oy and grief. His mind is of an inquiring order, an he possesses ability for philosophy, but In general, and for a con tinuance, a literature of a li hter and more imaginative kind would suit him best. He appears to have but little combativeness, destructiveness, acquisitiveness, or self esteem, which, with lar e cautiousness and no great degree of firmness, woul render him very likely to be much in?uenced by...
