Excerpt: . viii on the road There was some difficulty in getting on from Tashkent. I had two British notes, but no bank would change them. The clerks held the paper upside down, took it to their colleagues, who were supping tea whilst they worked at their ledgers, took it to the manager to show him a curiosity, and finally returned it to me with much regret. Don t think we are savages, said one bank clerk, because we do not accept your money. The fact is, we ve never seen it before and cannot even read what is written on it. Another clerk, a sympathiser, advised me that there was an Englishman in Tashkent, a merchant who did much business and had an account in the bank, bade me go to him, for he would know what the notes were worth, and would no...
