Excerpt: . . . 11 and investment earnings; flexible plan designs that accommodate the objectives of relevant stakeholders; voluntary defined contribu-tion plans that supplement defined benefit plans; exemption from most Federal regulation, allowing cities and states to design, administer and finance retirement benefits in concert with the unique needs of each pension plan sponsor and within the framework of each states constitution, statutes, case law and political culture; and finally, state protections of pension benefits, many of which predate and exceed Federal regulations of pension benefits among private employers. Sixteen million Americans, more than 10 percent of the nations workforce, are employed by a state or local government. These are public school teachers, administrators and support personnel, fire-fighters, public health officials, correctional officers, judges, police officers, child protective service agents and myriad other professionals responsible for performing a broad array of essential public services. Ninety percent of these workers have a defined benefit plan or traditional pension as their primary retirement benefit, a figure that stands in increasing contrast to the diminishing...
