HUMAN NATURE AND CONDUCT. All artistic literature may be regarded from two points of view, from one of which we have presented for our study and enjoyment its literary form, and from the other its subject-matter. Though form and substance are so closely related and blended as to constitute what is virtually an organic whole, it is allowable to select either of these two aspects for discussion, when the occasion requires it. But in that case it will be necessary to remember that it is not possible to give a complete critical estimate of any artistic literary production whose subject-matter alone is to be discussed; nor, on the other hand, is it legitimate rigidly to limit d priori either subject-matter or form, until our science of criticism shall approach nearer completion than it does to-day. Certain primary...
