Stockcero. Paperback. Book Condition: New. Paperback. 408 pages. Dimensions: 9.0in. x 6.1in. x 1.1in. Ifigenia: Diario de una seorita que escribi porque se fastidiaba (Diary of a young lady who wrote because she was bored, 1924) is the first of two novels by the Venezuelan writer Teresa de la Parra (Paris, 1889-Madrid, 1936). Her second, much shorter novel, Las memorias de Mam Blanca (1929), was one of the few authored by a woman to be admitted to the Spanish American canon before the radical rereading of the tradition by feminists in the 1970s and 80s. Ifigenia, however, was long neglected, in part, due to the controversy it ignited when it first appeared and its subtle and even deceptive use of a first person narrative. Recently, the contemporary Mexican novelist Carmen Boullosa has described Ifigenia as one of the most convincing, intelligent, and seductive novels in the Spanish language, and called its republication an elemental and necessary act of literary justice. In her own times, Teresa de la Parra mingled with the European and Latin American avant garde, but resisted its fascination while taking note of its lessons. Instead, she opted to respect the basic narrative rules of the 19th century, but used these to describe a very modern conflict: womens need for economic and intellectual independence, and the tragic and far from edifying fate reserved for those who fail to achieve it. Eugenia, the novels young, naive, but ambitious, intelligent, and well-read protagonistnarrator, tells her own story, at first in a confidential letter to her best friend, and then, to the ever forgiving indulgence of Dear diary. The narration is by turns witty, even mockingly funny, presumptuously self-important, and poignant as it reveals the temptations and doubts of an all too inexperienced young woman pressured to choose among too few alternatives....
