Excerpt: . . . and the improvements were as indicated in figure 9. The log bathhouse contained a dressing room, a sweat room, and a bathroom containing five wooden clear-water tubs and a mud-bath tub. Hot water was supplied by springs b and c (fig. 9), and cold water was also piped in from the stream, for the spring water is too warm (126 F. at the tubs) to be endurable by many people. The vapor constantly rising from the water causes the logs to decay rapidly and necessitates their renewal every three or four years. Slight differences in the taste and odor of the water from the several springs may be noted but appear to indicate no difference in character, all being sulphureted in varying degrees but not otherwise notably mineralized to the taste. Analyses of water from two springs of the group (see table on p....
